Carla Horn, York Campus president, said the graduates ranged in age from those who weren't old enough to drink alcohol to two people who were 51.

One of those older students, Wynne Graves of Manchester Township, decided to enroll after she was laid off from her job as a cafeteria aide and substitute hall monitor at York City School District in June 2011. She said the biggest challenge for her was simply hitting the books after being out of school more than 30 years.

"It was a rough transition, going back," she said, but she told herself "I can do this."

She added that her teachers made the transition "really easy."

Graves recently got a job with WellSpan Health as a physician's assistant. She said the school keeps students on their chosen career path.

Tama Allison, director of career services, said the school works one-on-one with students to help them prepare for the job search.

"We help them prepare resumes, cover letters, thank you notes, and we offer interview workshops," she said. "We assist students in finding gainful employment."

She added the school sees a lot of non-traditional students who work full-time and take care of families while attending.

Lily Meador, 7, and her sister Ashley, 11, greet their mother Tammi - a medical assistant graduate at YTI Career Institute - as she walks down the aisle Wednesday at the fall graduation ceremony at the Strand-Capitol Performing Arts Center. (DAILY RECORD/SUNDAY NEWS CHRIS DUNN)
